34. Notebook. Relating principally to events of the year 1886, just after Gurr's arrival in Samoa.

I have quite a bit of biographical information on Gurr, but most of this concerns his relations with leading Samoan chiefs, mainly on the political side, and is not what you need for a "thumb-nail" sketch. I know that Gurr went to Samoa about 1885 and shortly thereafter set himself up as an auctioneer in Apia. Several years later he became a partner in the firm of Hayhurst & Gurr, which provided the first formal banking service in Samoa. At the time of the Samoan Land Commission, Gurr succeeded one Rev. Claxton as Natives' Advocate. He retained this position afterwards, to represent Samoans in their appeals to the Supreme Court. He was a supporter and adviser of the Malietoa groups, which formed the officially recognized Samoan Government in the 1890's under the tripartite regime, and he represented them in various administrative and legal capacities. One reason for this association was the fact that Gurr married the daughter of Saumanutafa, who in turn was related to King Malietoa and who was a traditional supporter of the Malietoa family. Gurr, together with one Richard Hetherington Caruthers, appeared for Malietoa Tanumafili in the Kingship hearings before the Supreme Court in 1898, and it was partly due to the legal knowledge of these two men, and to the way in which they presented Samoan custom to Tanu's advantage that Chief Justice Chambers found against Mataafa, the "people's choice". Subsequently, Gurr was an ardent supporter of the British-American campaign against Mataafa, and had this campaign succeeded, Gurr would probably have stayed on in Apia. However, the advent of the Germans, and the ultimate success of Mataafa's cause, made Gurr's position in Apia quite untenable. Had it not been for an American offer to take the new Secretaryship of Native Affairs in Pago Pago, Gurr might have left Samoa altogether. His tenure of office in Pago was remarkably successful, until the unfortunate embezzlement case. He was popular with the Samoans, and he assisted the Government a great deal in organising the new native administration and in pacifying the people of Manu'a, who were initially hostile to American rule. He stayed on in American Samoa after being disgraced, and became a planter. In the 1920's he went to Western Samoa, and it was there that he was caught up in the Mau - oddly enough, in opposition to old Tanumafili, who remained loyal to New Zealand.
